"Don't that make your mouth water?"
"Worse dan dat, I'm sweatin' all over wishing for it."

UNCLE SIGH: "What's that 'ere thing yer bought, Maria?"
MARIA: "It's a newspaper lamp burner. The feller told me it would save half the oil."
UNCLE SIGH: "Well, by hucks; why didn't you buy two of them and save all the oil?"

"Bertie, don't you ever get in the swim?"
"Yes, in society; but not in the beastly water, don't you know! Good joke, ain't it! Ha! Ha!"

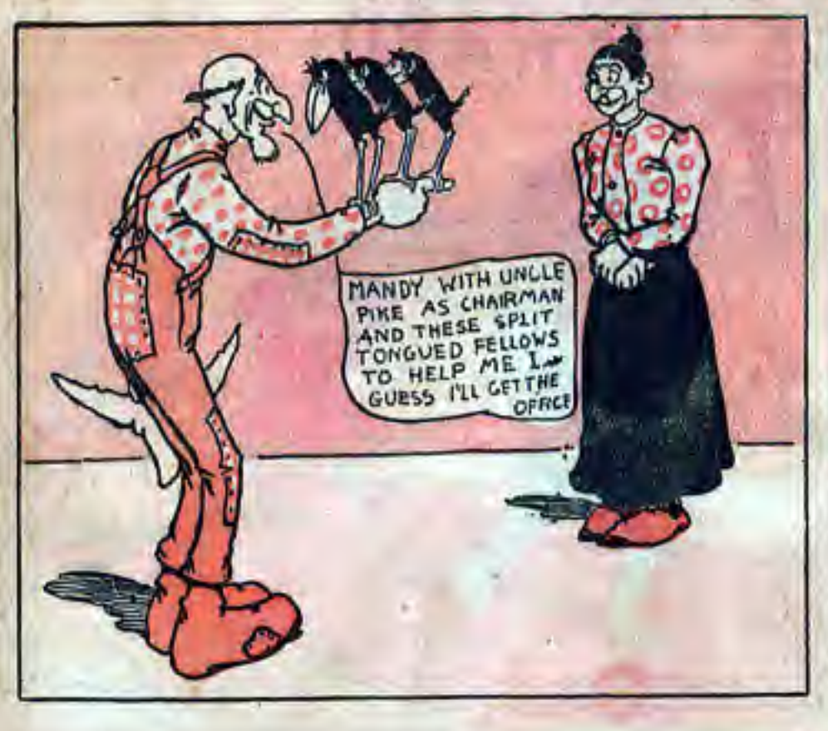
"Maw wants to borrow some skimmed milk from you folks, we ain't got enough to go around."
"Gee! Have you got some new hogs?"
"Yep, pa put an advertisement in the paper and a whole bunch have come to spend the summer."

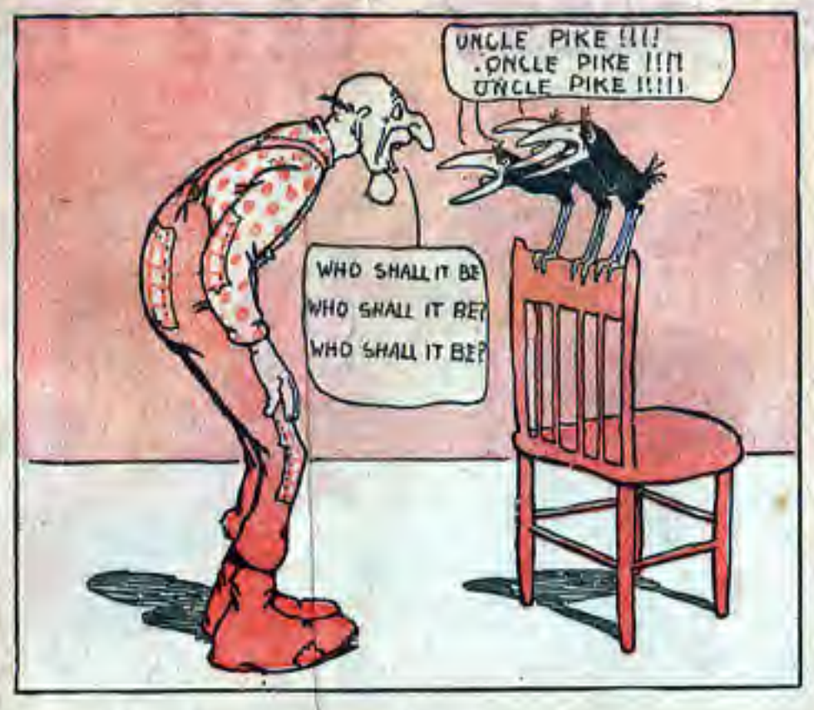
"Hully gee! De pain is fierce, but I got ter show a biceps ter get on Micky Flynn's baseball nine."

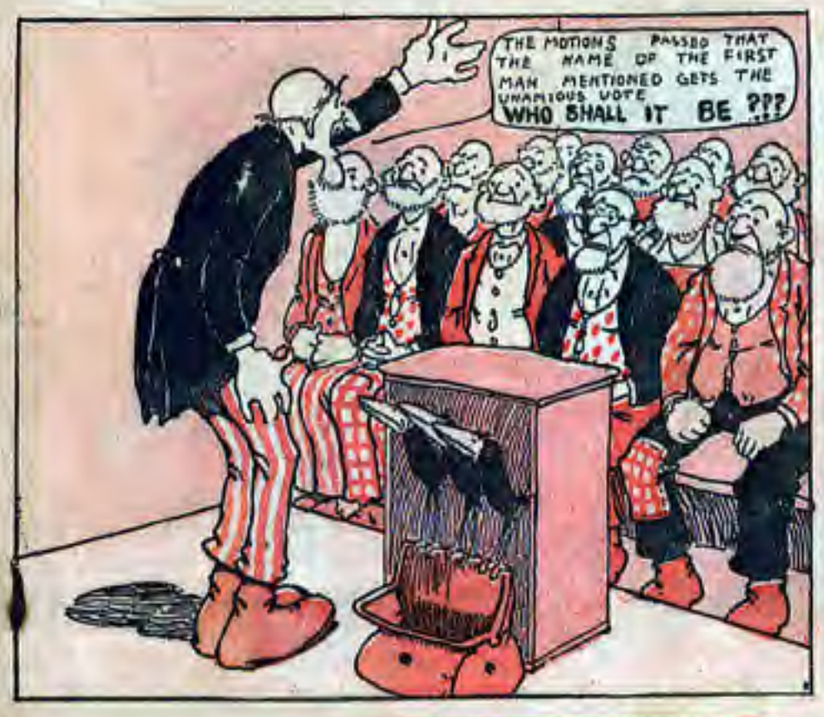
"This business is getting fierce. De editors are so darn lazy dey don't put nothin' exciting in de paper, and a fellow has to tink of something terrible to make de people buy dem."

"And who is your little comrade?"
"Dat? Oh, he ain't no comrade! Dat's only me valet!"

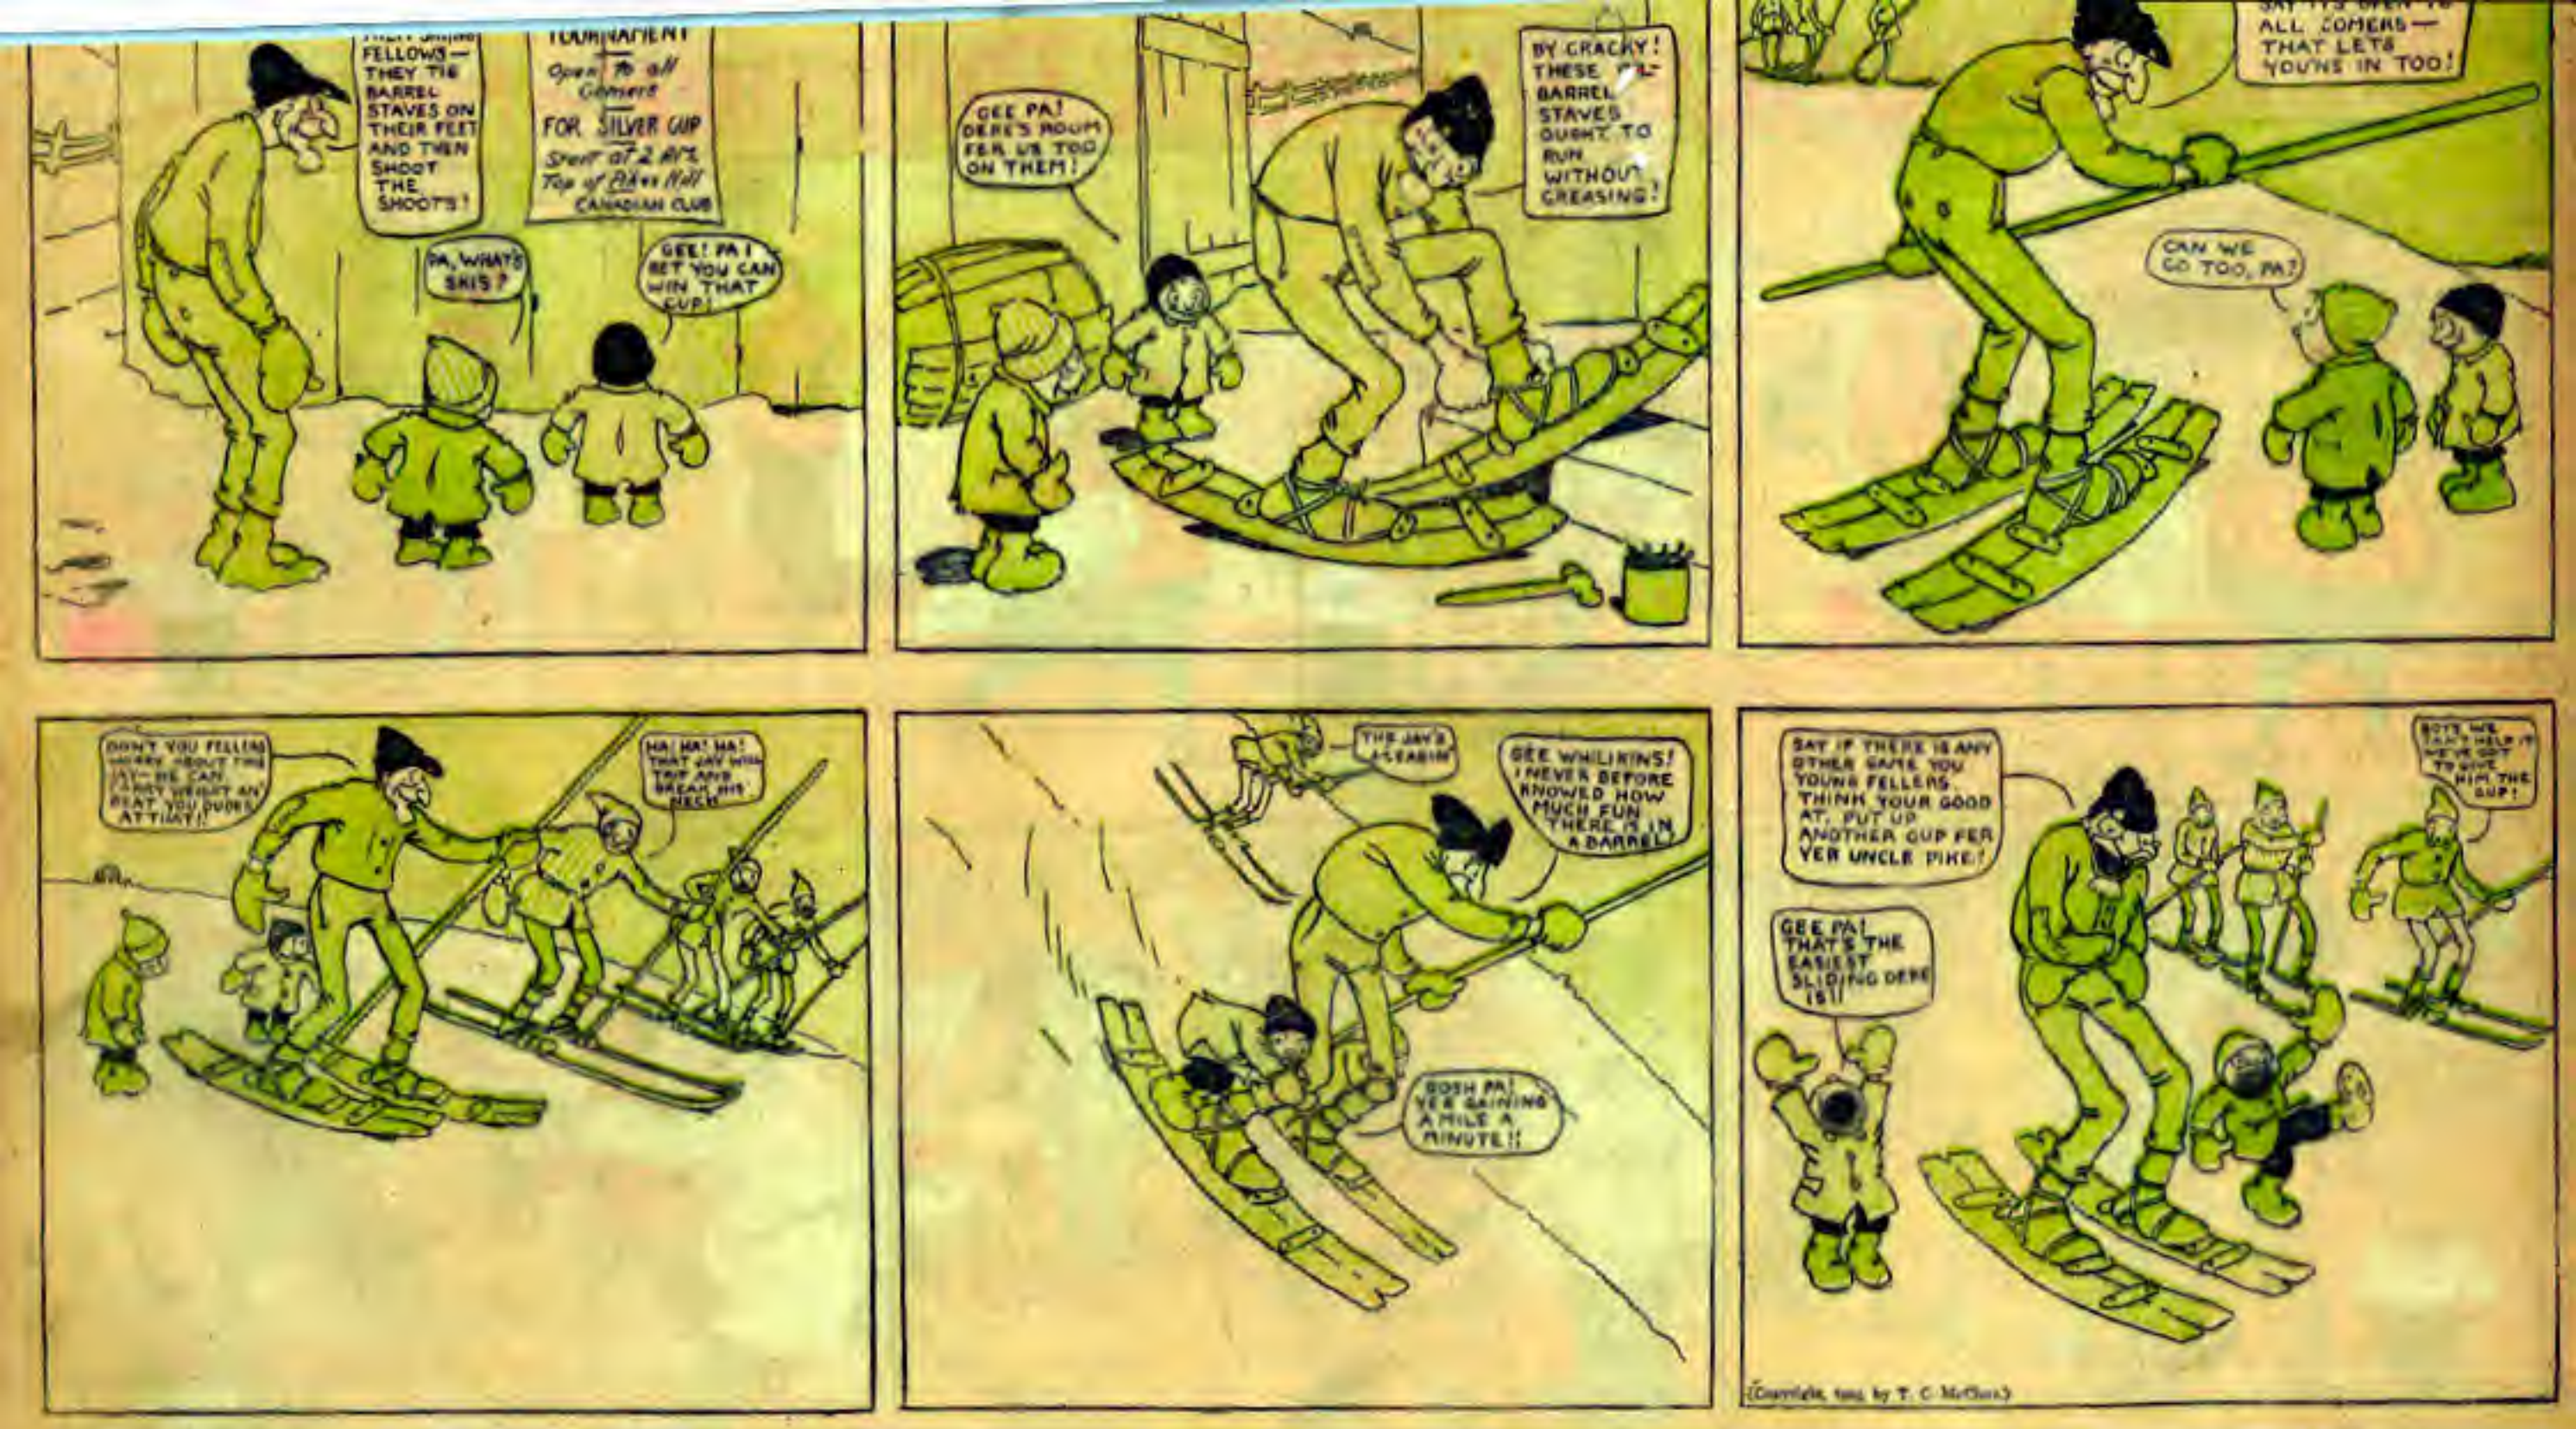
How Uncle Pike Secured the Unanimous Vote





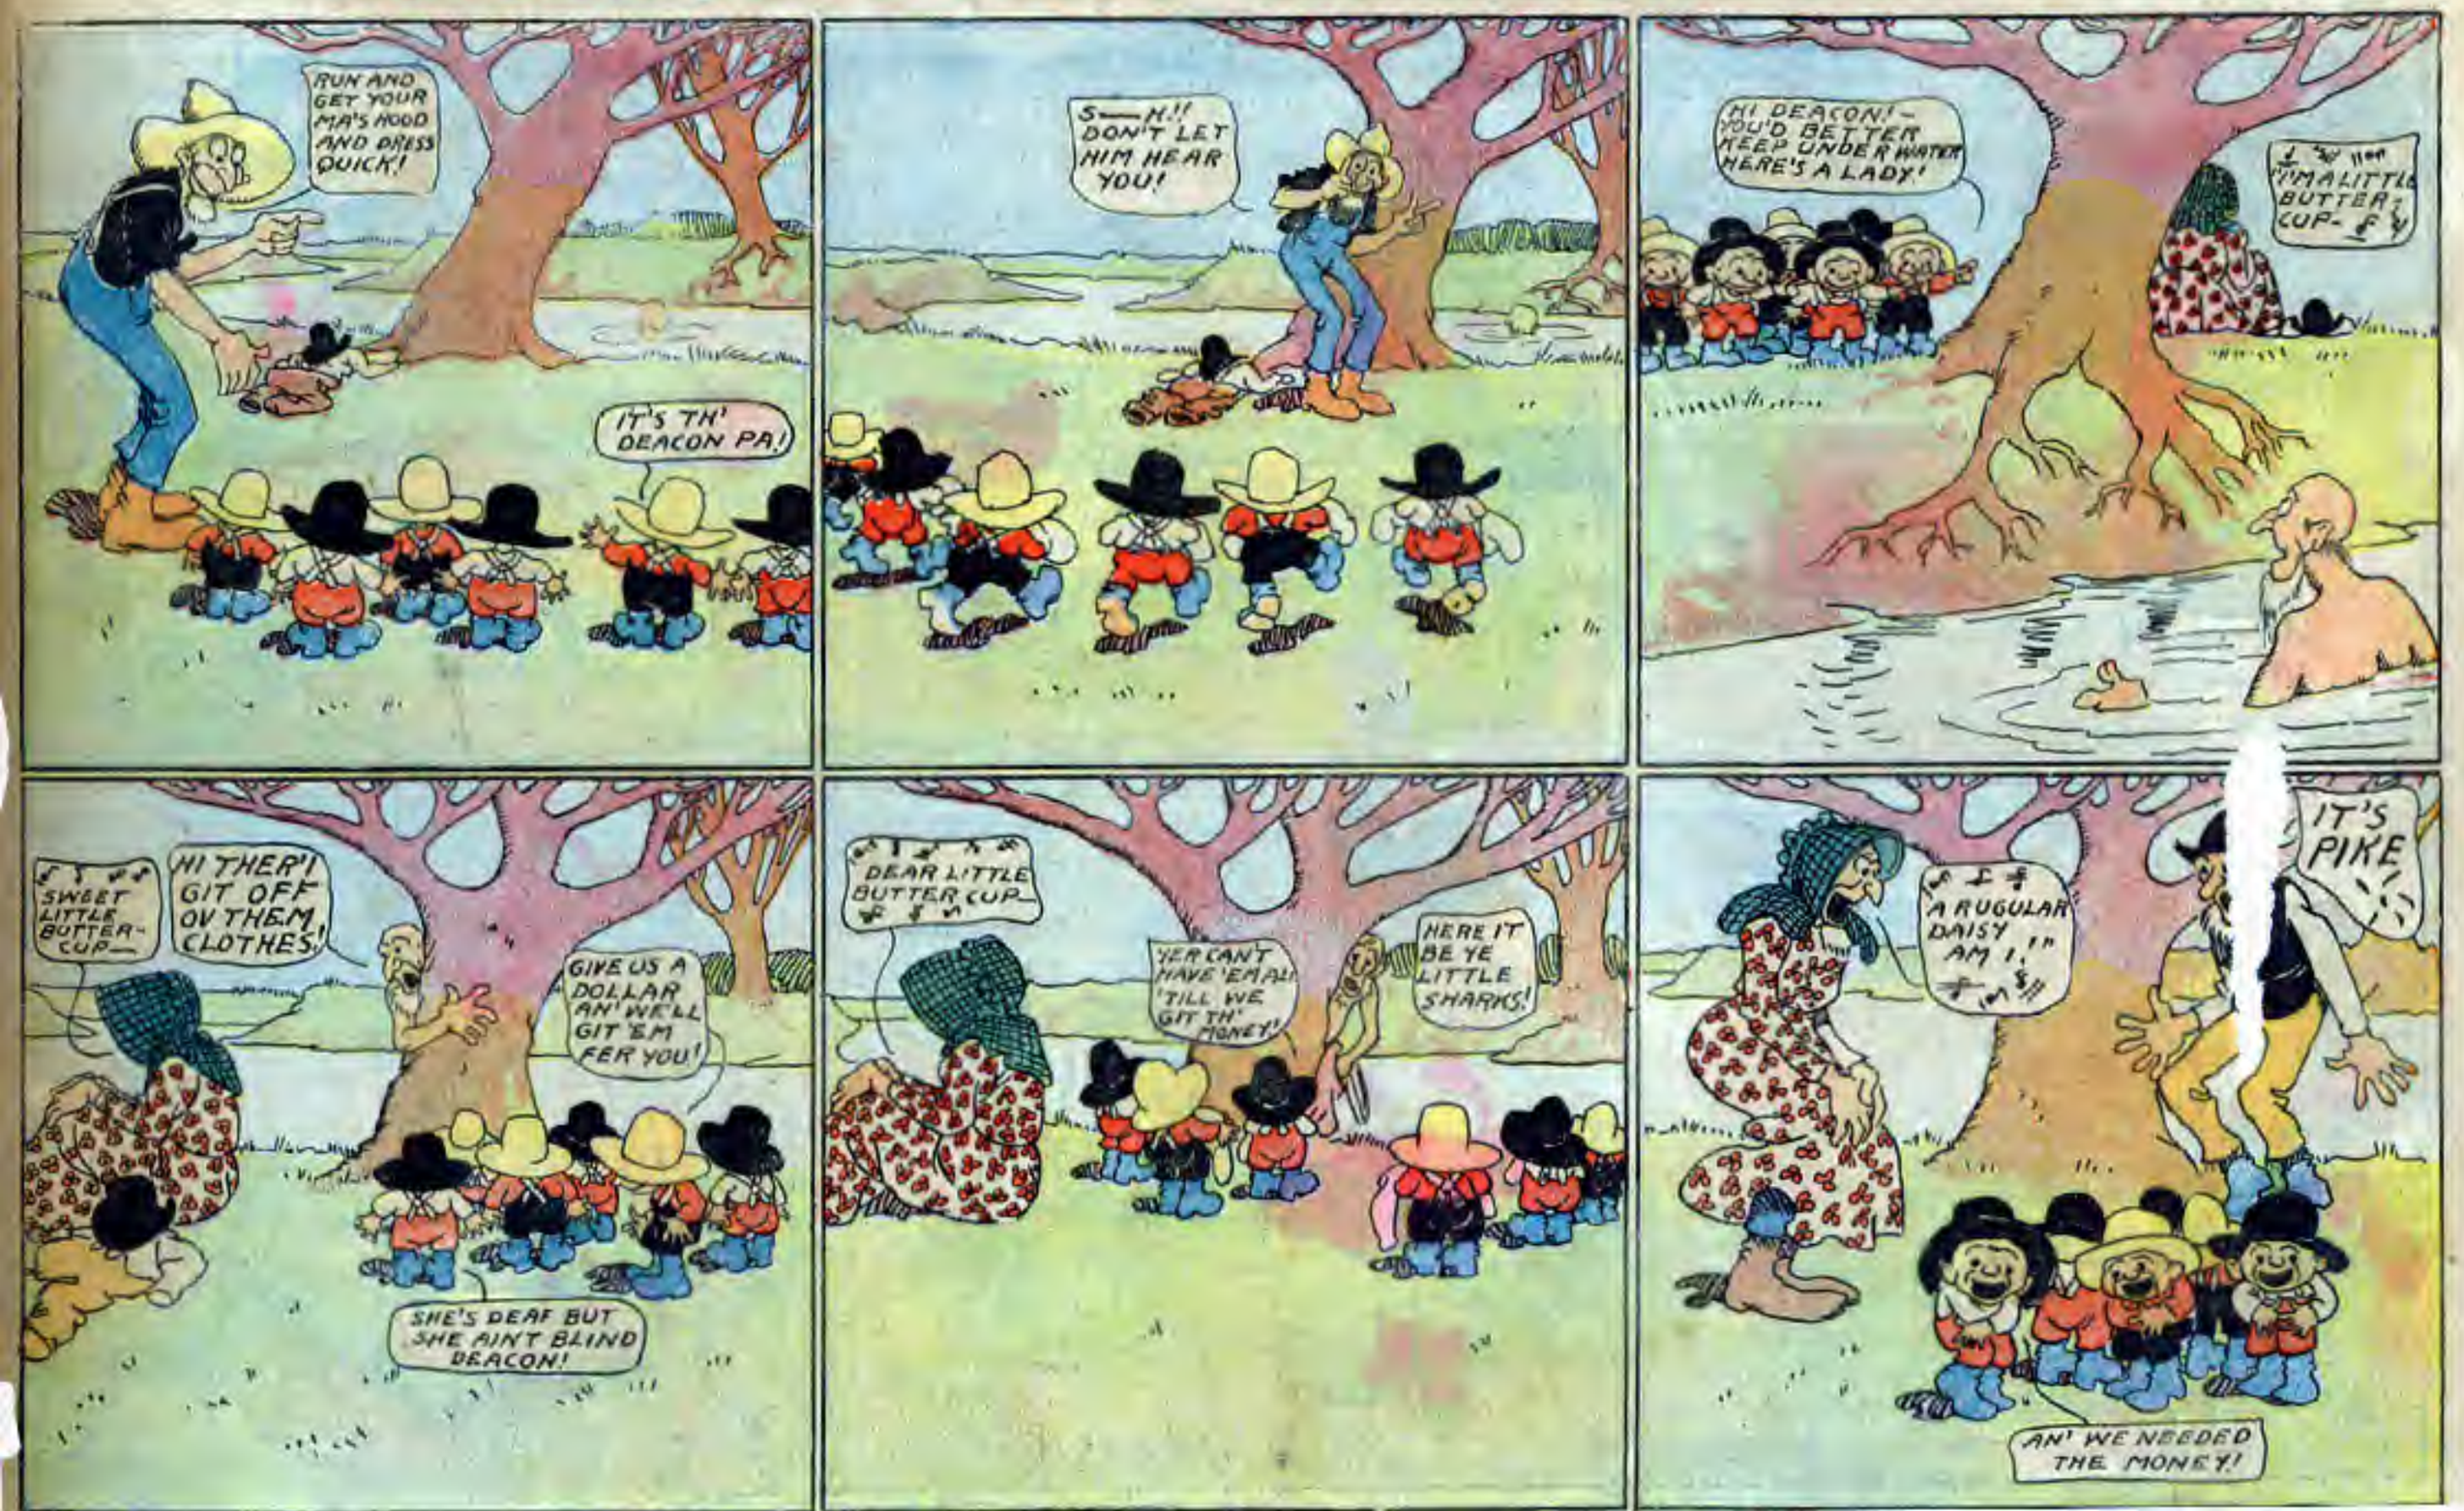


(Copyright, 1909, by T. C. McClure.)



(Copyright, 1905, by T. C. McClure.)

UNCLE PIKE AND THE DEACON ...



"Silas, I'll give ye twenty-five dollars fer that 'ere pasture lot up yonder."

"You'll have to speak higher than that, Hank, I can't hear them low figures."

"Say, Dutchy, you need an "I" in your business."

"Dot is rite! But I keeps me dot I in der store to look out for de monies."

"I am afraid, friend, thou hast been imbibing freely."

"Nay, thou art wrong, neighbor, 'tis a sovereign this kingly feeling has cast me."

"My foot is much smaller than yours. I wear a double A."

"Why, they look like a D."

"Oh, that's because I bought them at a bargain sale and they were marked down."

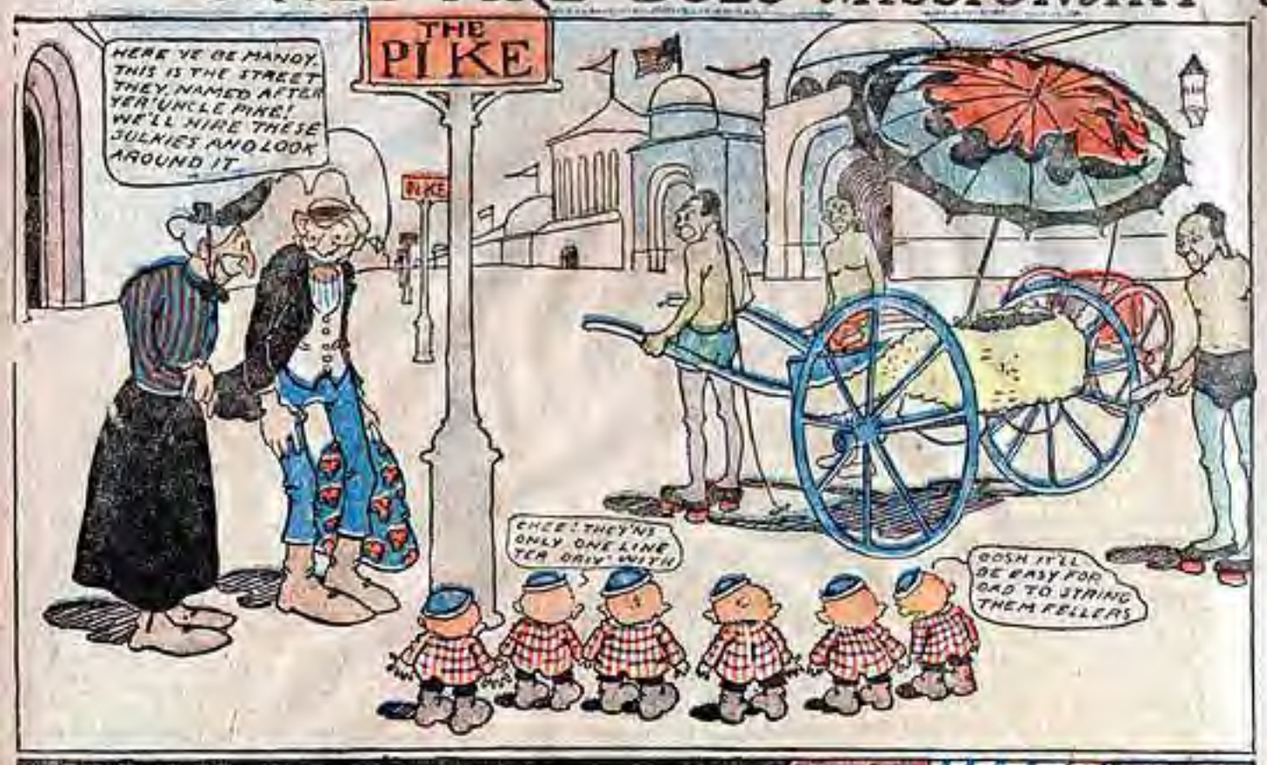
"Yep, I saved her husband's life once, but she don't know it."

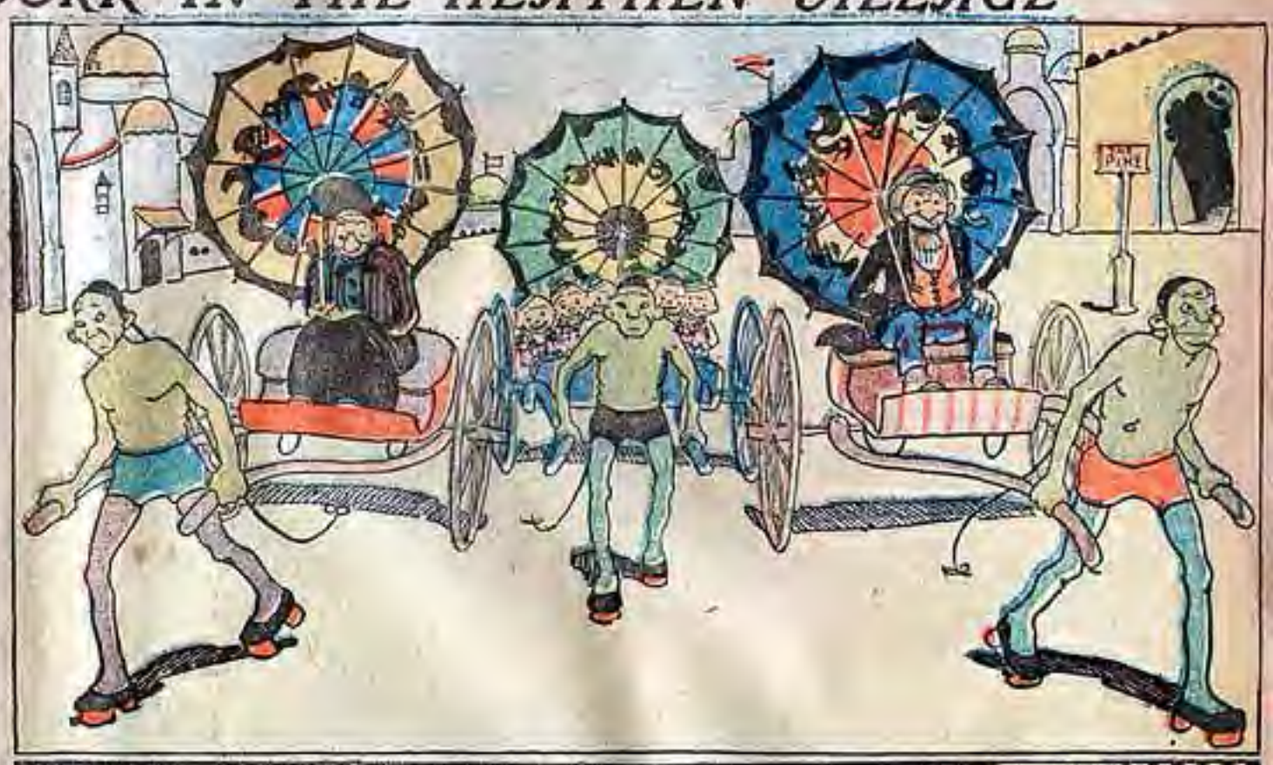
"How was dat?"

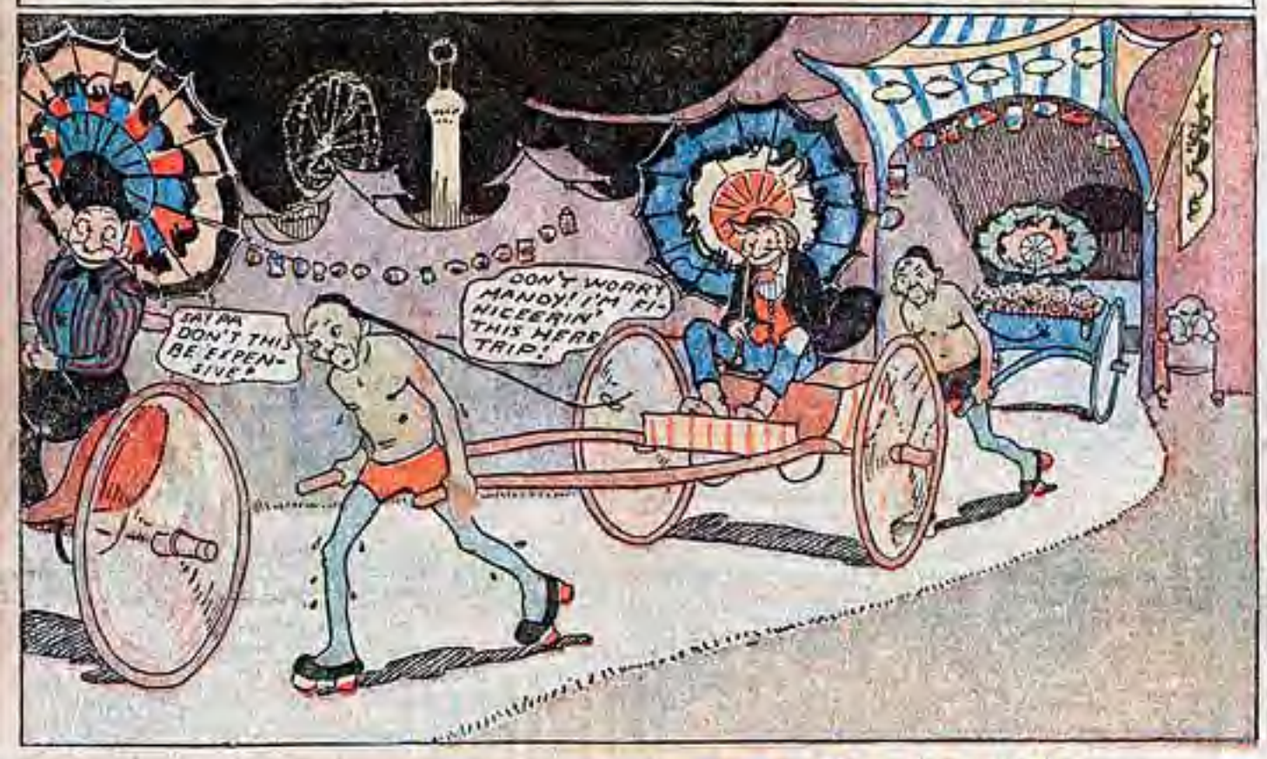
"Why, I eat de first batch of biscuits 'dat she ever made for him."

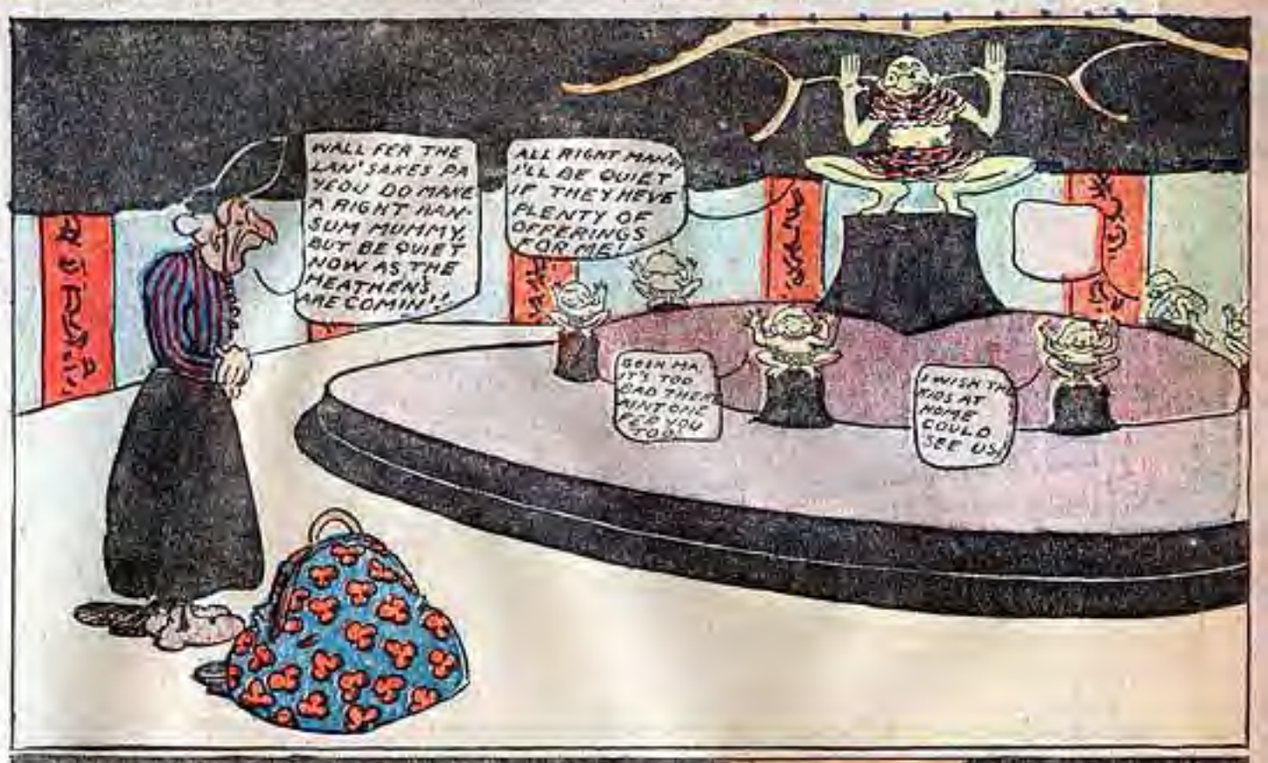
UNCLE PIKE WINS THE SKIING MATCH

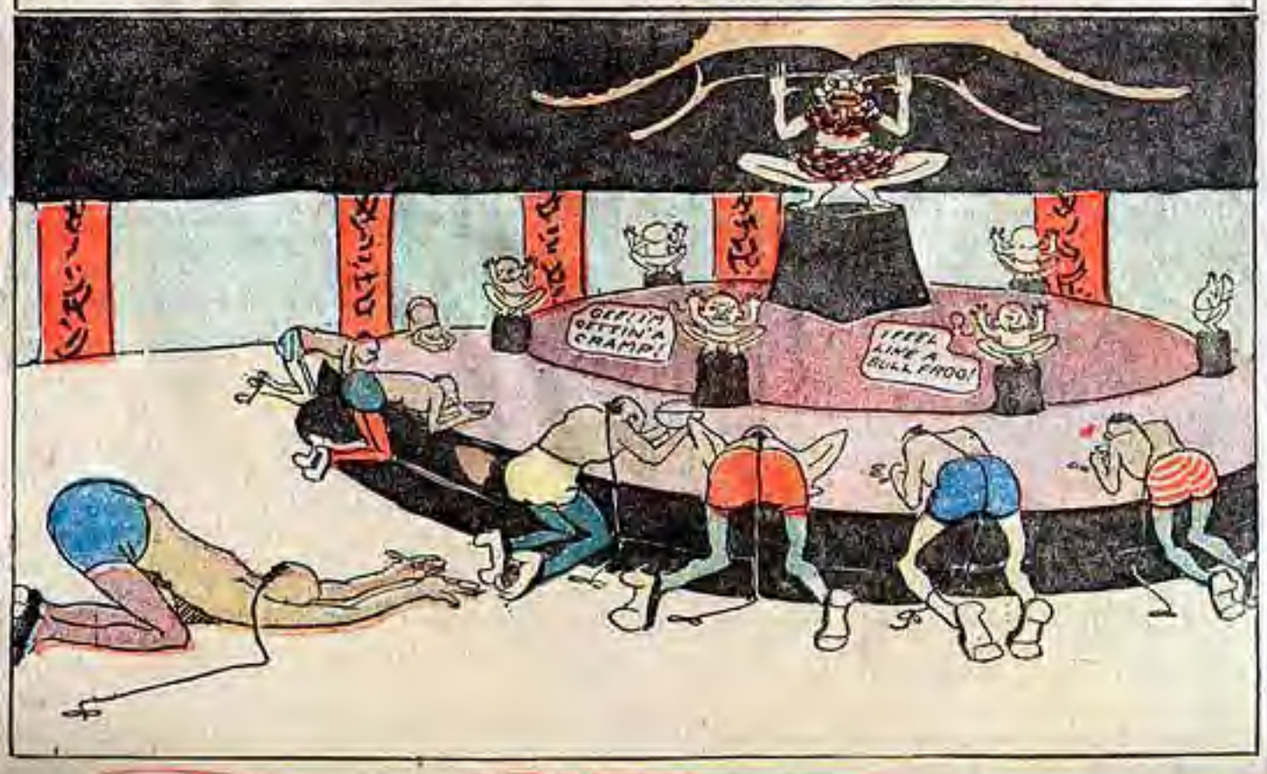
UNCLE PIKE DOES MISSIONARY WORK IN THE HEATHEN VILLAGE











Copyright 1914 by T. C. McClure